

EDITORIAL

Henry Bauer always wrote erudite, perceptive, and witty editorials. I am going to miss them—and so are you!

My big news of the quarter is that we have been fortunate enough to recruit Courtney Brown as an Associate Editor. He has already managed three submissions and made persuasive recommendations (that I have been happy to accept) on all three. As you will learn by going to Google, there are two famous Courtney Browns. One was a defensive end for the Cleveland Browns. (He is not an Associate Editor.) The other (who is an Associate Editor) is a mathematician who is Professor of Social Science at Emory University. Courtney has very wide interests, so he may expect to get more than his fair share of submissions. (That is the price you pay for being eclectic.)

Welcome aboard, Courtney.

I am also happy to report that in this issue we resume the Book Review Section that we had to drop in Volume 22, Issue 1, which was devoted entirely to our late lamented and revered Ian Stevenson. We are grateful to David Moncrief for continuing to shepherd this entertaining and enlightening part of the Journal. I personally look forward to the book reviews as a welcome dessert that comes after the meat-and-potatoes of the research reports.

Welcome to Volume 22, Issue 2.
